

Limestone Fenceposts

Imagine yourself as a 1880s homesteader on the vast, treeless expanse of north-central prairie. As a soon-to-be farmer, you are responsible for protecting your property from range animals, for by law, cattle could graze on any unfenced homesteads. You must put up a fence to lay claim to your parcel of land. But how? You need fence posts, but few trees grow. Lucky for you, the region of north-central Kansas is filled with a limestone rock layer from which you can make stone fence post. Today that rock is know as "post rock." When freshly quarried the rock is soft enough to be shaped with tools and will harden to become durable and fire resistant after being exposed to air.
